Health on the Range? Rural community health information on the Web

Anyone with access to a computer and the ability to perform a search on Google, Yahoo, or a similar search engine has likely perused web pages providing information related to health and wellness. Yes, health and wellness cover a wide range of subjects and material. Recently I found a list of web pages providing information on rural health care issues and resources. By no small coincidence, I found this list at a library conference workshop about health-related web pages! Some of these pages provide medical information, while others focus on educating the user on specific medical issues. Even if you don't live in a rural community, you might find knowing if there are any environmental Superfund sites near where you live a good piece of knowledge to have.

Medline Plus Rural Health Concerns:

<http://www.nlm.nih.gov/medlineplus/ruralhealthconcerns.html>

People in rural areas face some different health issues than people who live in towns and cities. Getting health care can be a problem when you live in a remote area. You might not be able to get to a hospital quickly in an emergency. You also might not want to travel long distances to get routine checkups and screenings. Rural areas often have fewer doctors and dentists and certain specialists might not be available at all. Considering the Tribe has a health center on its lands, it may not seem that Kilbuck is in a rural community. None the less, there are situations where members of the Tribe's community have needed to travel outside of Coos County to receive medical care for a specific health concern. The web page listed above includes links to information and organizations which are focused on rural health care issues. The page also includes links to frequently asked health questions in regard to elders living in rural communities.

Toxtown:

<http://www.toxtown.nlm.nih.gov>

The National Library of Medicine sponsors Toxtown, a web page that lists and describes every possible environmental health concern and toxic chemical you could find in a community or neighborhood. Toxtown allows visitors to select generic locations such as Town, City, Farm, or Port to learn about suburban, urban, border, rural, and coastal environmental health risks. Once you have selected a neighborhood, you can search for specific locations, such as where you work or where you go hiking, and learn more about many potential, well-known toxic chemicals found in these locations.

Toxmap:

<http://www.toxmap.nlm.nih.gov/toxmap/main/index.jsp>

Toxmap is related to the National Library of Medicine web page that uses Geographic Information Systems (GIS) to help users explore data from the Environmental Protection Agency to research chemical and environmental health information. There are not any Superfund sites near Coos Bay. If there were, this would be the page to find them.

DIRLINE:

<http://www.dirline.nlm.nih.gov/>

DIRLINE provides a directory and search tools to health organizations including online resources and real life health centers. The web page includes a search engine allowing you to specify fields such as an organization's name, a specific medical condition, and resources with services for the hearing impaired. Separate search engines focusing on disaster organizations and toll-free health hotline phone numbers (there are over 300!) are also made available.
